

[(00:49)] Interviewee: Yeah. Asian Migrant Center is basically a regional NGOs just somehow based in Hong Kong. We are doing a lot of advocacy policy and we also conducting research. We're publishing Asian Migrant Yearbook. And then we are doing a lot of capacity building programming for the NGOs, but somehow, my responsibility at that time was actually in charge of the Domestic Workers Programming. So I'm doing a lot work in Hong Kong, like 50% of my time to do work in Hong Kong, but another 50% is I'm doing work in Taiwan, and then Singapore and also in Indonesia, some part Malaysia and South Korea.

[(01:29)] Interviewer: Right.

[(01:30)] Interviewee: Yeah.

[(01:30)] Interviewer: So you have a --

[(01:31)] Interviewee: Collaboration with the NGO's partner in the country where I'm visiting.

[(01:36)] Interviewer: So you have a good understanding both from a local level, from the NGO --

[(01:39)] Interviewee: Yes, and also international.

[(01:40)] Interviewer: -- and also international level.

[(01:41)] Interviewee: Regional partner --

[(0:42)] Interviewer: And regional, right. So one of the questions I had and if you know, I wanted to try to get a sense of when did the migration start for domestic workers from Indonesia? I know it may probably have some --
